Emily had purchased a return ticket to the Derby.

She was carrying an invite to a Suffragette ball later that day in London.

Pinned to the inside of her jacket was a Suffragette banner.

She had been witnessed on Morpeth Common, practicing stopping horses.

According to local historian, Mrs Howes, Davison resorted to running onto the track as a 'plan B' after an attempt to pin the colours to a horse in the paddock failed. She said 'plan A', the safer option, was scuppered when Davison was recognised and barred from entering the pen.

She was found to be carrying a race card with the name of the king's horse circled.
